CHAPTER V TECHNICAL DEVELOPMENTS Technical developments. Brief notes of progressive developments of industries based upon the special chemistry of cellulose and derivatives. The following matters are dealt with, with illustrative special communications: --Textile fibres, proximate composition in relation to spinning quality: cotton (flax and ramie), jute, and heart damage of commercial fibre. Textile bleaches--chloramine reactions as incidental to processes of bleaching with hypochlorites, notably flax bleaches. Ligno-celluloses and Rohfaser as constituents of cattle foodstuffs. The problem of digestion and assimilation. Special cellulose industries. Artificial silks (lustra-celluloses) and the competitive evolution of the three processes of manufacture. The viscose process and progress in production of silk, and film by continuous process. Cellulose Acetates: progress of industrial applications, with some considerations on technology of celluloid and technical conditions of competition. TECHNICAL PROGRESS AND DEVELOPMENTS. The cellulose industries with their general and special technology are of colossal dimensions as object and subject of human activity. We make no attempt to chronicle or follow the lines of progress in so vast a field. We must in this section limit ourselves still more exclusively to impressionist sketches of matters which have come directly within our practical experience. In the staple industries of textiles and paper-making we have noted the formation of specialist societies as an index of progress. The Textile Institute was inaugurated at a meeting held on 22 April, 1910, at Manchester, of which a full account is contained in No. 1 of the T. I. Journal, together with...
